in some town wherein he could not reside himselfe; or by the King made guardian of a County, untill he had furnished it with an Earle: These Vicounts had but la moyenne Justice, la haute being reserved by, or for, the Earles themselves (and therefore in most of the customes of la Gaule Belgique that Jurisdiction is hitherto stiled, Vicomtiere;) howsoever, they were at first but Officers; and, even at this day, the Prevosts, or Iuges of Normand villages are termed Vicomtes. Now it is to be presumed, that when the Earles of Provinces, &c. usurped a propriety in their charges, the Vicounts, not to be behind them, did the like in those townes, and villages which they governed. There be at this day three or foure sorts of them; first those that, holding immediately of the Crown (as the Vicomte de Turenne, and but a few others) are to be ranked among great, or high Lords, and before any Barons: then those that, holding of the King as of Counties remitted to the Crowne; or holding of Counties lately created, or not yet reunited (and being thereby in the quality of Attierévassaux de la Couronne) are no better then meane Lords, and precede onely those Barons that either but equally, or be inferior unto, them in Tenure: Lastly, those (in Picardy, Flanders, and elsewhere) that having not hitherto been able to compass more then a mean Jurisdiction, and therefore not meriting the place, or esteem, of absolute Lords, are not qualified Vicomtes, but barely, and in difference from the rest, Signeurs Vicomtiers.
